

NEW BOOKS.

"The Lover's Rubaiyat," Edited by Jesse B. Rittenhouse. Published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston.

The motif of this dainty little volume indicated by its title. It is a book for sweethearts, young and old. The quotations are most of them new except to the students of Omar, though the familiar ones will perhaps seem the best after all. We find the one beginning: "The Book of Verses underneath the Bough," and that other, "The bird of life is singing on the bough," and again, "Let, ah, that Spring should vanish with the Rose!" and "Ah, Moon of my Delight who know'st no wane."

With these old favorites come many new and exquisite lines. The quatrains are so arranged as to have some unity and sequence. They are drawn from the best of the translations—Percy's, the "Gleanings of Europe," and the rendering of others.

The "Lover's Rubaiyat" is an addition to the library of translations of the great Persian's great poem.

"Her Fiance," by Josephine Daskam. Published by Henry Altemus company, Philadelphia.

"Her Fiance" is the first of the four stories of college life written while Mrs. Bacon was still a student at Smith college, her alma mater, and now republished. They are clever as the work we would expect from the pen of Josephine Dodge Daskam. Mrs. Bacon, even in her salad days. They are bright and witty and an interesting revelation of college girl life and interests. The last of the stories, called "The Point of View," will find an appreciative audience, especially among students.

"Cabbages and Kings," by O. Henry. Published by McClure, Phillips and company, New York.

The frequent revolutions in our sister republics of Central America savor somewhat of the opera bouffe, and they have endless romances and stories of adventure. It has remained for Mr. Henry to take the humorous view of these periodic upheavals and to write a series of clever and amusing stories involving the attendant incidents.

The reader is sure of several good laughs as he follows the fortunes of the American consul, called "Johnny," and associates, with Keogh and Clancy, two amusing Irish adventurers. The thread of romance surrounding the planter, Goodwin, and the opera singer and the refugee president leads an interest. The native maiden, the American banker's daughter, the peon, the various presidents, "his and out," pass across the stage to an accompaniment of farce-comedy with an occasional touch of the serious, and all entertaining and diverting.

Small, Maynard & Co., Boston, have issued a holiday edition of their "Wit and Humor of Well Known Quotations," edited by Marshall Brown. The publication is one of the best compilations of humorous literature issued in recent years. It embraces the best of old classics and all of the modern humorists, ranging all the way from Ecclesiastes, Puns and Shakespeare down to Burdette and Bill Nye. An invaluable part of the book is an index of the best known quotations, which covers most of the phrases in common use as aphorisms, but which few people can trace to their original source. The book is well printed on good paper, is excellently bound and has an attractive cover design. Public speakers and students will find it particularly useful.

Walt Whitman, by Isaac Hull Platt. Published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston.

This volume is one of the Beacon biographies of eminent Americans being edited by M. A. De Wolfe Howe. There have been many essays written about the "good, gray poet." They may be divided for the most part into essays of appreciation and essays of abuse. Mr. Platt's little biography must come under the first head. Perhaps we are still too close to Whitman to hope for anything else; at any rate the critical faculty seems to desert a man when he begins to talk of him. Nevertheless the book in hand is of considerable interest and value. In his preface Mr. Platt says: "This little book is an attempt to bring into brief compass the salient features of one who is among the most picturesque figure in American letters. The man Whitman, in his 'salient features,' stands revealed as was promised. The biographical data is selected with discrimination and is suggestive and interesting. The storm of criticism that assailed the first publication of the 'Leaves of Grass' receives much attention. There is an interesting analysis of the 'Leaves of Grass' which is generally recognized now as Whitman's masterpiece. Who can forget the beginning lines? 'When lilacs last in the dooryard bloomed, And the great star early droop'd in the western sky in the night. The comments upon the poet of the distinguished men of his time are quoted at length: Emerson, Burroughs, Howells and others.

For nineteen years Whitman was an invalid, but his martyrdom gave opportunity for him to enjoy the ample recognition of his genius that is not always the fate of such men as he. This little biography of Mr. Platt is not the final word upon Whitman, nor does it claim to be, but it is an interesting and suggestive little volume.

A Prairie Infanta, by Eva Wilder Broadhead. Published by Henry Altemus company, Philadelphia.

Here is a story for girls simply told with a wholesome lesson in a sugar coated form. The scene is laid in a Colorado mining town, where the daughter of the mine owner, the infanta who is the child of a Spanish mother, dead at the opening of the story, and a careless, well meaning prospector father, a Texan. Then there is the foster mother, Miss Jane Connor, who hides a noble heart under a homely exterior, some Mexican neighbors, and a good doctor. There is little incident but enough to account for the development in the young girl's character and to lead up to a happy denouement.

Far from the Madding Girls, by Guy Wetmore Carr. Published by McClure, Phillips & Co., New York.

The quaint humor of Mr. Carr's fancy is as marked and as individual in this new story as in his earlier works. The hero, a young man of thirty, having fallen heir, unexpectedly, to a small fortune, proceeds to arrange a home for himself. He is weary of land ladies and table d'hôte dinners; he aspires to be a bachelor and explains that one cannot be a thoroughly authentic bachelor under $500 a year. Short of that income, one may, of course, remain unmarried; but to remain unmarried means nothing more than to be a single man, and our hero wishes to be a bachelor. His scheme of life involves a residence far from the maddening girls, the pursuit of which many amusing things happen, with the curtain rung down at the last on our bachelor being much in love with one of the maddening girls who has promised to be his wife. In the meantime, however, there are many amusing experiences in the housekeeping of the hero, in his encounters with his cook Galvin and his boy-of-all-work Ned, in his Newell's funny pictures interpret the text admirably, and add much to the pleasure to be found in the book.

Eighteen Miles from Home, by William T. Hodge. Published by Small, Maynard & Co., Boston.

Joseph Bucher is a young man who reads Shakespeare aloud and fancies he is to be a great actor. The inexperience and credulity of Joseph are taken advantage of by some traveling show people who get his money and leave him penniless, and accused of theft in a town eighteen miles from his home. The sufferings of Joseph and his histrionic vices and failures fill a couple of hundred pages.

Amy Dora's Amusing Day, by Frank M. Eicknell. Published by the Henry Altemus company, Philadelphia.

This is a story of a little girl who ran away and who had some adventures. There is in the book, so the title page announces, "possibly some sense, certainly a good deal of nonsense, or the entertainment of those who like that sort of thing."

Amy Dora's experiences make a sort of up-to-date Alice in Wonderland recital, and one that will be diverting to the youngsters.

Santa Comes But Once a Year!

And All This Week He'll Be at Walker's Waiting for the Children.

His ruddy, cheery old face wears a broader smile than ever before because he's so glad to be back again with the children. A whole year to be away does seem such a long time. Then he's glad, too, to find our little folks' land prepared just to his liking. The toys all set out on shelves that every little girl and boy may see them well and determine exactly which one Santa must be told to bring. Besides, the wonderful, wonderful, lots of all kinds pleases him -- looks so like his own workshop way up near the north pole. Tomorrow until Christmas eve are "at home" days here and every child in Salt Lake City is invited to call.
